THE LIBERATOR.

Mr. Lieutenant-General Scott, and Mr. Mayor of Boston, in his address to the Congress of the United States, has truly said, "that the Liberty of the People of the United States is a sacred trust, which they alone can hold. It is the property of the People. It is the right of the People. It is the duty of the People. It is the interest of the People. It is the security of the People." And he thus adds, "They must be the guardians of it, or they will lose it. They must be the protectors of it, or they will be destroyed. They must be the defenders of it, or they will be defeated. They must be the custodians of it, or they will be abandoned." And he concludes, "They must be the custodians of it, or they will be abandoned."

HAROLD.

Mr. Territory, in his speech to the Congress of the United States, has truly said, "that the Liberty of the People of the United States is a sacred trust, which they alone can hold. It is the property of the People. It is the right of the People. It is the duty of the People. It is the interest of the People. It is the security of the People." And he thus adds, "They must be the guardians of it, or they will lose it. They must be the protectors of it, or they will be destroyed. They must be the defenders of it, or they will be defeated. They must be the custodians of it, or they will be abandoned." And he concludes, "They must be the custodians of it, or they will be abandoned."

HAROLD.

Mr. Territory, in his speech to the Congress of the United States, has truly said, "that the Liberty of the People of the United States is a sacred trust, which they alone can hold. It is the property of the People. It is the right of the People. It is the duty of the People. It is the interest of the People. It is the security of the People." And he thus adds, "They must be the guardians of it, or they will lose it. They must be the protectors of it, or they will be destroyed. They must be the defenders of it, or they will be defeated. They must be the custodians of it, or they will be abandoned." And he concludes, "They must be the custodians of it, or they will be abandoned."

HAROLD.

Mr. Territory, in his speech to the Congress of the United States, has truly said, "that the Liberty of the People of the United States is a sacred trust, which they alone can hold. It is the property of the People. It is the right of the People. It is the duty of the People. It is the interest of the People. It is the security of the People." And he thus adds, "They must be the guardians of it, or they will lose it. They must be the protectors of it, or they will be destroyed. They must be the defenders of it, or they will be defeated. They must be the custodians of it, or they will be abandoned." And he concludes, "They must be the custodians of it, or they will be abandoned."

HAROLD.

Mr. Territory, in his speech to the Congress of the United States, has truly said, "that the Liberty of the People of the United States is a sacred trust, which they alone can hold. It is the property of the People. It is the right of the People. It is the duty of the People. It is the interest of the People. It is the security of the People." And he thus adds, "They must be the guardians of it, or they will lose it. They must be the protectors of it, or they will be destroyed. They must be the defenders of it, or they will be defeated. They must be the custodians of it, or they will be abandoned." And he concludes, "They must be the custodians of it, or they will be abandoned."

HAROLD.