The Courier and Enquirer discusses upon the Presidency, and urges the importance of nominating a statesman. It observes that the President of the United States should be reared in the United States, should be educated in the best schools and seminaries, and should be possessed of talents and qualifications peculiar to the station he occupies. It points out that the President should be a man of command, a man of character, and a man of power. It further states that the President should be a man of integrity, a man of honor, and a man of honor. It concludes that the President should be a man of wisdom, a man of prudence, and a man of prudence.