The February 1880 issue of The Nation contains an article discussing the importance of free speech and the role of the press in society. The author argues that the press is essential for the dissemination of information and the promotion of democratic values. The article also touches on the issue of censorship and the need for a free and open press to ensure a functioning democratic society. The author cites examples of attempts to restrict the press and argues against such restrictions, emphasizing the importance of a free press in a healthy democracy.

The article further discusses the role of the press in holding those in power accountable. It notes that the press is a critical mechanism for exposing corruption and wrongdoing by those in power, and that this is necessary for maintaining a democratic society. The author argues that the press must continue to be free and independent in order to fulfill this role.

The article concludes with a call for action, urging the public to support a free and independent press and to speak out in defense of press freedom. It emphasizes the importance of maintaining a free press as a bulwark against authoritarianism and the abuse of power.

The article is written in a style that is both informative and persuasive, using examples and anecdotes to illustrate its points. It is a thoughtful and well-reasoned piece that remains relevant today in the ongoing debate about the role of the press in a democratic society.
